

A glorious white sand beach on the island of Anguilla served as a backdrop for Stacey and Matthew's wedding. The bride wore a Carolina Herrera gown. The couple were married under a silk chuppah.

When Stacey Kaye and her beau, Matthew Bronfman, a partner at a private equity firm and Seagram heir, saw the Cap Juluca resort while visiting the Caribbean island of Anguilla, they were instantly enchanted. "It has incredible style—very Bohemian and luxurious in a cool Moroccan way—and the sand is like powdered sugar," Stacey says. Small wonder, then, that when the couple became engaged, they opted for the resort as their wedding site, welcoming 150 family members and close friends for three days of festivities.

Stacey, who is vice president for design and merchandising at the Jones Apparel Group, planned the details down to the guests' gifts and enlisted New York-based wedding coordinator Meg Critchell to help with the organizing.

Like many great celebrations, this one featured delightful surprises. "For our Shabbat dinner on Friday night, Matthew had an awesome Israeli guitarist, David Broza, flown in to play for me," Stacey says. Though it rained torrentially that night, Saturday dawned clear and sunny.

Saturday morning, the guests took catamarans to Prickly Pear, a deserted island nearby, to swim, eat jerk chicken and dance to a steel band. "You literally had to jump off the boat and swim to get to the island," says Stacey. "One friend who was swimming near us laughed and said, 'Of course, I'd really rather be in a tuxedo right now!'"

That night everyone gathered at Mango's restaurant, on Barnes Bay, for a party with a fire dancer, a reggae band and a DJ.

On Sunday, rain clouds gave way to sun a short time before the wedding began. "Cap Juluca's manager told Matthew, 'I don't understand; you must have a direct connection up there,'" Stacey laughs. The ceremony, which was conducted by rabbi Chaim Sampson, epitomized beach chic. Stacey performed the mikvah, the bride's ritual bath, in the ocean. Her florist, Antony Todd, created a very simple chuppah, draping an ethereal white silk canopy with long chains of orange and white Hawaiian orchids.

Stacey wore a Carolina Herrera gown of silk tulle that was delicately embroidered with ribbons and sequins. She and Matthew were escorted by the bridal party,